

Who is the first aid course for?

Driving any motor vehicle exposes people to a greater risk of accidents, which consequently can be more severe than other human activities.

The responsible person is expected to help those in need, this implies that they should equip themselves with the necessary skills to provide or bring adequate help. This is why every student driver is required by law to take the first aid course.

This course is also valuable training for anybody who finds themselves in a situation where they are required to help someone suffering from a medical emergency at home, at work or during a leisure activity, whilst they await an ambulance or help from trained health professionals.

In summary, in order to obtain a driving licence, the first aid course is mandatory but is also extremely useful for people who do not drive yet may be faced with an accident in everyday life.

Our courses are approved by the Federal Roads Office.
